The role of socio-emotional competences for learning and development (KSL Numer 455342)

Lecturer: Prof. Eveline Gutzwiller-Helfenfinger,
Department of School and Teaching Research

Socio-emotional competences are a key factor for successful learning and development. There is an array of research that shows that socio-emotional competences support individuals' development in various domains such as language development, social integration, educational outcomes, professional success, or personal growth. Furthermore, social competences are also highly relevant for learning in institutional settings.

This course is based on a theoretical input with a specific focus on empirical research on socio-emotional competences. Taking the overall importance of socio-emotional competences for individual development into account, this course addresses several disciplines: Human Sciences, Management, Medicine, and Economics.
